

to make it thick, so that the spider can not feel the footsteps of the town's people.

The duke was pleased to see such a brave young knight so he agreed to give up all the armour that was needed. He also agreed to give the brave boy ten strong men and a noble steed.

The next day they set off to the misty moors to defeat the spider. Guinevere told the men to hide so they would not get hurt. Then she stomped really loudly to lure the spider from the top of the mountains. When she saw the creature, she ran for her life into the cave, it was pitch black. The dazzling moon shone upon the sword the spider's shadow whizzed past. At that moment, Guinevere sliced it in half. She quickly told the men to roll the rock in front of the cave. When the deed was done, the spider was no more. She took one half of the spider back to the duke and he was fascinated, "Well done dear boy!" he exclaimed.

At that moment, Guinevere, smiled and took off her helmet. Everyone was fascinated and the duke was shocked. He realised that his father was wrong; girls can do things that boys do. Everyone bowed as the duke gave brave Guinevere treasure and his love.

Legend has it that whoever moves the rock will never see living daylight again

By Kallie Reddock